Manager's Commentary

Our analysis of Macro, Technical, Fundamental and Geopolitical indicators shows that some stresses are building in the market, although there are few signs, as yet, of real weakness in the economic data.

Geo-political risks has weighed on the markets since the start of this year with the US-China trade war, in particular, seeing no resolution as of yet. The US has now imposed tariffs on $250bn worth of goods with another $200bn in the pipeline while China has responded to by easing monetary policy and devaluing the currency to offset the effect of the tariffs.

A tightening of US monetary conditions and a stronger dollar have provided emerging markets with heavy headwinds this year and after a period of relative weakness we now see longer-term value in selective markets.

Despite the length of the current cycle, US earnings and macro data points still point to further upside in US and global equities. That said, relatively lofty valuations have generated some nervousness which is likely to lead to higher volatility in the markets over the coming month. For now, we remain overweight equities relative to bonds, closely monitoring our triggers for any clear signals of a move towards a more risk-off strategy.
